Murder in McClellanville: Did Robert Lee Smith kill?

by Elton Manzione

The signs are inconspicuous and, except for a small gatehouse, you don't really get the impression you are riding onto a prison compound. The narrow road winds its way past a field full of cows and several small farm ponds and up over a small rise. That's when you see it. The two large fences with rolled barbed wire at the top enclosing a series of low, new buildings. It can only be compared to a suburban high school campus. A close look reveals a series of photoelectric detection devices between the buildings and the fence. This is the S.C. Department of Corrections' Kirkland Correctional Institute.

Entrance to the prison is via a long sloping tunnel which passes under a moat running along the front of the compound. Silent cameras cast their wary eye on each soul passing by. Inside the main lobby a guard sits at a display console scanning half a dozen television monitors and twice as many electronic gauges. There is an aura of 1984, A Clockwork Orange and Farenheit 451, all rolled into one. The atmosphere is unnerving and a bit opressive.

After identifying myself and being frisked I am led through two electronic gates and while passing through the second an observation is made.

"He has blue jeans on," a guard tells my escort, "be sure he stays in the interview area."

It seems blue jeans are the official prison garb, replacing the stripes and khaki of previous years, and the guard is worried that should I leave the proscribed area I may not be able to get out. I begin to worry too.

My interview with the prisoner is long, but uneventful. He speaks slowly, and except for a few moments, unemotionally. He tells the same story I have read in hundreds of pages of court testimony and heard from dozens of persons involved in the case. The same story--unchanged after six years.

I walk out of Kirkland, but Robert Lee Smith stays behind--sentenced to remain here for the rest of his life. As I drive down the road something Smith said keeps echoing in my mind.

"I ask myself why am I sitting here doing someone else's time?"

Robert Lee Smith's troubles began on an April morning six years ago. Smith, then 13, had gotten a ride with a neighbor to a local crossroad grocery to buy some items for lunch. Smith was offered a ride home by the store operator, Meta Fogle. It was a custom of the store to give rides to its customers, but Fogle was a bit annoyed since Smith had only bought a few items.

When the pair arrived at his home Smith offered Fogle 50¢ for gas in an effort to mitigate the situation.

"No we don't charge customers for carrying them home," Fogle told him and drove away. Smith waved to his next-door neighbor, Barbara Jean

The cat hotel

By popular legend, writers are supposed to have a special affinity for cats. Ernest Hemingway let 23 cats roam freely through his house in Havana. I, having not yet reached the stature of a Hemingway, only have eight cats, not counting the raccoon who visits every night, and the occasional possum. Well actually, I don't have eight cats. I really only have one -- namely Rosie, a beautiful and well-bred tortoise-shell from Florida. The rest have more or less moved in, much to Rosie's disgust.

There's Red, a dead ringer for Morris the cat, except for all the scratches and wounds on his body. He's a big, mean stud of a cat, and if he were human, he'd be a common street hoodlum. His number-one opponent is One-Eyed Man, a big stripped gray cat who's had an eye clawed out, possibly by Red, but who still manages to get along. There's also Black Lady, who Red made pregnant last February and whose kittens now play in the cool grass out front. And there's Tom, a young sensous male cat, black and white, who is the son of Black Lady, by an earlier litter.

I don't know where these cats came from. I don't know where they're going. But in the meantime, I end up feeding them and giving them some affection, at least as much as I can get away with, in spite of Rosie's jealousy. I wish the people who raised these cats hadn't abandoned them, or hadn't treated them so harshly that they were compelled to run away. But pets can't fight back -- they have no political clout -- so human irresponsibility toward them goes unrequited. It's amazing how so many humans can have so little feeling for the well-being of animals. Did we not, after all, domesticate cats (and dogs) in the first place? Did we not, that is to say, make them wholly dependent on us? Well then, we have a solemn responsibility to take care of them. Yet how many unwanted pets are born each day, and how many are put to death each day, and how many must live miserable suffering lives? There should be a law to ensure that all female cats and dogs, except those specially desired for breeding, must be neutered, and this neutering ought to be done free as a service of the government, si- 's plainly cheaper than chasing stray pets, hauling them to pounds, loc. them up, feeding them there, and finally gassing them to death. It's plainly more merciful, too. It is a terrible thing to visit a pound and see all the beautiful and loving cats and dogs, starving for affection and hungry for freedom. It's terrible to see them and realize that soon they'll be put to death, because no one is willing to give them a home.

> "...One's in danger of being looked on as an eccentric if he speaks too fondly of cats. It's declasse' to show very much compassion for pets..."

It seems that women don't like cats as much as men do. My theory is that it's because cats, even male ones, are essentially feminine animals. They're soft, sensuous, and affectionate, whereas dogs are bony, clumsy clods. Yet there's a wider difference between the two species: Cats are more mysterious, more crafty, wiser, less trusting, more sophisticated in their intelligence. They take their time before they accept a human as a friend. Cats were domesticated later in history than dogs, and hence they still retain an element of wildness (people who see my big-eyed cat Rosie for the first time often ask if she's some species of exotic wildcat). More than that, cats are meticulous in their personal habits. They wash themselves after every meal, and they tend to be highly discreet at la toilette. In contrast, your average dog is as likely as not to squat down and relieve himself in the middle of the patio right during an elegant dinner-party.

Cats, in fact, have been considered sacred animals by some past cultures. Yet in other cultures cats have been tortured and persecuted as agents of Lucifer himself, and even today there are weird, sick people who go around killing cats out of stupid superstition. (Two of the three kittens in Rosie's first and only litter were poisoned in Florida by some unknown wierdo who hates black cats).

One's in danger of being looked on as eccentric if he speaks too fondly of cats. It's declasse' to show very much compassion for pets. Perhaps the stigma comes from the manifold stories of people, usually fat elderly women, who dress up their pets like people, sit them at the dinner table, and speak to them in minced words, as if they were children. Of course such is absurd, and frankly, if anyone tried to pull that on Rosie, she'd hiss and spit and pop them good across the face. (And since cats in general are too intelligent to put up with such nonsense, it usually gets practiced on dogs, especially poodles).

Ah well, my country house turns into a cat hotel at night, and Mr. Raccoon drops by for a visit too, and it's all right. But I have to wonder why there are so many swinish people who treat animals so irresponsibly that they end up having to mooch off people like me, who are suckers for the sad eyes and plaintive meow of a lost kitty.

"...the South's rate of metropolitanization is nearly double the average annual rate for the United States as a whole, and has been all during the forties, the fifties, and the sixties. ...Although this difference poses a threat to Southern central cities, it also offers Southern cities a precious chance to reshape themselves by means of the immense growth ahead. Consider the advantage of having that opportunity before us at a time when the mistakes of other cities stare us in the face--mistakes which they can no longer correct but that we may be able to avoid."

In olden days legends were made of men with guns who were willing to stand alone against the most disadvantegeous odds. Those were peaceful, loving men who would just as soon have hung up their irons and put in a hard day's work for a good day's pay. But times forced good men to strap on their pieces and go out and face the meanest, toughest badmen around; to face them eyeball to eyeball with both feet planted firmly on the ground. And when the smoke had cleared away, only one man, a real man, was left standing. Ah, but those days are gone forever, you might be saying.

You'd be wrong about that, pardner. There's a new man in town you might have heard of by now. He goes by the name of the "Tooth Fairy Kid" and he can be every bit as tough as those old western legends. He might not be squaring off with the likes of Jesse James or Billy the Kid in the streets of Columbia, but in the short time he has been around, he has sent out a warning to an unknown number of crazy, wild, wacko motorcycle punks who want to ride around without their helmets on that he means to keep law and order in our town.

Yessir, the "Kid" had to dig around in his bedroll he brought with him to Columbia and pull out his old six shooter and strap it on. We can sleep peaceful tonight, pardner, just knowing the kid is in town and he is packin' his .38 and there ain't nobody gonna cut him down.

"On the advice of security aides, Gov. James B. Edwards wore a .38 revolver on his belt Thursday after his office received 'bitter' calls about his veto of a bill to repeal a law requiring all motorcyclists to wear protective helmets."

"Rode hard and put up wet"

Inexplicably, Spartanburg is leading the state in production of national recording artists. First there was the Marshall Tucker Band. Now another Marshall--Marshall Chapman--is headed for the big time. Interviewed in the June 2 issue of Rolling Stone, Chapman told writer Chet Flippo: "You know my history, right? Blue blood from South Carolina, father runs the Inman Mills, sang since I was a little girl, went to Vanderbilt, studied French, went to France. I went to Boston and made one more stab at the kind of life my parents wanted me to live."

Chapman gave up and went to Nashville, began playing in small bars, told a CBS executive he had a "cute ass" and ended up with a recording contract. Flippo says Chapman's first album "wasn't all that good," but one cut--"Rode Hard and Put Up Wet"--has been popular.

Chapman told Flippo she's changing her style some now. "I started off, as a kid, I got off on Elvis, the Swinging Medallions--Maurice Williams and the Zodiacs was the first album I ever bought. I call that beach music. Not Beach Boys. I mean Myrtle Beach. That's what you dance to at the beach. That's the music I'm writin' now."

"I'm writin' songs," she told Flippo. " 'Why Can't You Be Like Other Girls?'; 'Don't Make Me Pregnant.' I been feelin' real light-hearted."

The Tooth Fairy Kid

Chapman will appear with the Marshall Tucker Band June 4 in Spartanburg.

It pays to advertise

Columbia seems to have its share of slick publications that come in for awhile and then mysteriously disappear, and thinking back on a few of those brings to mind the adage "if you scratch my back, I'll scratch yours." You were likely, more often than not, to see a glowing review of a local restaurant or a short pluff piece on some local personality or businessman and then turn a few pages back and find an ad from that same restaurant or businessman. It was obvious from first glance that the magazine's sole purpose was to sell ads and each of those that came and went had little, if any, substance.

That philosophy has not died, and the best example around town right now is a new slick known as Greater Columbia magazine. Its most recent issue is living proof that "it pays to advertise."

The May issue's cover story is all about Arthur M. Williams, the President and Chief Executive Officer of South

Nuclear terrorism

Could a band of terrorists, like the Hanafi Muslims who seized three buildings in Washington recently, create a nuclear device and blackmail an entire city—and nation? The answer appears to be, frighteningly, yes.

In as chilling a document as I have read, a congressional advisory group called the Nuclear Proliferation and Safeguard Advisory Panel, after working on the problem for a year, has come through with a 522-page report. Thomas L. Hughes, Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, chairs the panel, which includes George B. Kistiakowsky, who helped build the first A-bomb; Alvin M. Weinberg, Institute for Energy Analysis at Oak Ridge; Theordore B. Taylor, Princeton, top nuclear weapons inventor, and others of similar weight. The report is cool, and understated. It has a kind of simple, scientific authenticity of style. It carries a glossary at the end to explain things like Fast Neutron ("A fast-moving, neutral subatomic particle") and Breeder ("A nuclear reactor that produces more fossil nuclear fuel than it uses to produce power"). After reading the explanations you don't understand it much better. But one thing appears over and over that even the most ignorant grasps: It is later than you think.

Yes, it says, "the appearance of increasingly violent and sophisticated terrorist groups has added another element of fear and uncertainty to the nuclear proliferation issue." It imagines such a band of nationalists: "a group of perhaps a dozen well trained and very competent persons with experience in several fields of science and engineering. They would need the support of a modest, already established, scientific, technical and organizational infrastructure." It is assumed that they would buy fissionable material on the gray or the black market, or steal it. Under such conditions they could put a bomb together, says the report—"if these requirements are met and the program is properly executed, the objective might be attained approximately two years after the start of the program, at a cost of a few tens of millions of dollars."

Result: a militarily effective nuclear explosive.

Suppose the group isn't national; has less money; is composed of fanatics, maybe, crackpots or criminals; the report discusses their chances, also. "At the low end of the minimal range of effort, a small group of people (possibly terrorists or criminals), none of whom have ever had access to the classified literature, could possibly design and build a crude nuclear explosive device. They would not necessarily require a great deal of technological equipment or have to undertake any experiments."

> "...A well trained Commando raid of about 8 or 10 attackers using an imaginative plan and assisted by insiders would be difficult to resist without rapid reinforcement..."

To be sure, it would be risky: "The group," says the report, "would have to include a person capable of searching and understanding the technical literature in several fields, and a 'jack-of-all-trades' technician..."

In these clumsy hands, the writers declare, "a member of the group might suffer serious or fatal injury. However, there is a clear possibility that a clever and competent group could design and construct a device which would give a significant nuclear yield."

Significant yield? Oh, say the equivalent of a couple of kilotons of dynamite. (Kilo, of course, equals 1000). Enough to demolish lower New York.

The report considers the world situation 35 years after the first chain reaction under the grandstands of the University of Chicago and the explosions in 1945 on Hiroshima and Nagasaki which Harry Truman said didn't interrupt his sleep those nights. Today six nations have the bomb; two dozen more have the economic and technical requirements to follow suit; others are straining to get the weapon and the wastes from nuclear plants used to create light and power can be used to stuff bombs.

How fast things move. It seems only yesterday (it was 1945) that Senator Brien McMahon tried to put the genie back in the bomb by an act of Congress and "to preserve the secret and confidential character" of the process. He failed.

Then in 1946 the US proposed the "Baruch Plan" with bombs banned after an international authority was set up. The Soviets balked; they wanted all US bombs destroyed six months after signing the convention. Irreconcilable differences developed, so here we are, today, with a new nuclear confrontation at Moscow. India has breached the barrier between the nuclear great powers and the rest of the international community. Will Brazil be next?

Sometimes we have imagined that proliferation would come—a long time in the future. "Some day," we said. Has it come now? It seems unlikely. Where, for example, would terrorist bands get fissionable material?

"Theft is the most direct route to nuclear weapons," explains the scientific panel quietly. It points out that "the psychological value of a successful theft would be considerable even if the weapon were actually unusable...."

"A well trained Commando raid of about 8 or 10 attackers using an imaginative plan and assisted by insiders would be difficult to resist without rapid reinforcement."

The scientists who make their report to Congress are mild, quiet men; matter of fact, very low-keyed. They urge Congress to enact stronger protection for the nuclear system. They explain that a band of "non-state adversaries" (i.e., terrorists) seeking to make a bomb would need "only modest machine-shop facilities that could be contracted for without arousing suspicion." Even with a "jack-of-all-trades" leader the attempt might well be a failure; on the other hand there is a "clear possibility that a clever and competent group could design and construct a device...."

A black market—? It is restrained at present by lack of supply but widespread plutonium recycling could remove this constraint; the report says, "some demand appears to exist already as evidenced by Libya's attempts to buy a bomb." Most dangerous would be an international feeling that restraints were collapsing; that the present precarious structure of the world's political system was coming apart.

It is doubtful that even the United States could then reject authoritarian safeguards. Says the report grimly, there is "a widespread feeling that time is running out."

Carolina Electric and Gas. It has such insightful facts about Mr. Williams' life as: "Similarly, there are many things Arthur does which are noteworthy and which keep industries going, plants running, hospitals working, nursing homes functioning, medical and educational laboratories operating and all the rest of the office and home equipments and appliances humming smoothly helping to make people's lives a little easier." The back cover of the magazine carries a full page ad from SCE&G.

Then there are the two feature stories on John Terry and Jim Hamilton. John Terry of course is an associate of Bob Fulton on the Gamecock broadcasting network and part owner of Taylor Street Pharmacy. Jim Hamilton is an executive with Midlands Aviation Corporation and, as the article puts it, the efficient operator of Owens Field, "Columbia's busiest commercial downtown airport," (not to mention its only one). Of couse, there are full page ads from both Taylor Street Pharmacy and from Midlands Aviation Corporation. And there's the article on Soviet Block Shipping by W. Don Welch, the executive director of the South Carolina State Ports Authority and, you guessed it, a full page ad from the South Carolina Ports.

But perhaps the funniest thing the mag did in its May number was to print, verbatim, a handout sent over from the Fort Jackson p.r. department. The "article," which is kind of an annual report in outline form, provides Greater Columbia's avid readers with such eye-opening facts as the number of gallons of sewage treated in FY 1976 (836,258 K), and the number of dependents participating in the fort's teen club (256). If you can bear the additional excitement, read on and discover under Item 12 the exact number of pounds of foodstuffs inspected by Moncrief Army Hospital last year (242,668,009).

Some magazines actually try to disguise this sort of puffery, but Greater Columbia makes no bones about it. If you're interested, you can pick up a copy at your local newstand for the bargain price of 75 cents. Or if you just can't wait until it hits the stands, sign up for a year at $7. And if you'd like a feature article about your very own self...

Roundball: the recruiting sweepstakes winners

by Herb Buhl

Starting October 15, college coaches across the country will begin to teach, instruct, coach and mold their newly recruited prep All-Americans into the stars of the future. Some may not live up to their press clippings and some of these talent-laden young men may not be enrolled very long due to numerous considerations such as injuries, homesickness, problems with grades, and motivation. Some may leave early espousing "the play-me-or-trade-me" line heard from the pro athletes.

These factors may all take their toll as well as the lure of the big money from pro basketball. One example, 6'8" Earvin Johnson (Parade Magazine co-player of the year) who, upon announcing his choice to attend Michigan State University informed the listeners that his goal was a dual one--the Big Ten and the NCAA crowns. Earvin indicated that he would wrap these goals up quickly because "I want to get prepared for pro ball. I don't know how long I'll be at State. A lot of pro teams have been looking at me..."

So even if a school lands a blue chip prospect there is no guarantee he will be there very long. Consider the transfers of Steve Krafcisin from North Carolina, Brian Magid from Maryland and Steve Walker, Brian Walker and Dirk Ewing from North Carolina State. The North Carolina State transfers are stories of great expectations, failed hopes, shattered dreams and anger, according to a recent Charlotte Observer article. Steve and Brian Walker will be returning to Indiana to play at Purdue while Ewing will enroll at Stetson. The problem starts with recruiting. As Sloan admits, "when I'm recruiting, I do everything short of swear to a prospect that he'll be in the line up; I'll tell him 'you're the best guard I've seen' or 'you have qualities our other people just don't have.' I suppose, we're (coaches) a little responsible for the pickle."

The player frustrations were caused not only by a lack of playing time, but according to Ewing, "I could've adjusted to playing 5 or 6 minutes a game if I had felt I was part of the team. Nobody every tried to make us reserves feel like we were important. It didn't seem to bother anyone whether we showed up or not." The problems at State were not the black-white player relations that have been hinted at, but Sloan's apparent inability to handle player-coach relations. As Brian Walker said, "Coach Sloan flipped me out. Like in December, we got back from a road trip real late and he had us out on the court at midnight, working. He said if we missed a practice, we'd be suspended. Next morning, Clyde (Austin), Hawkeye (Whitney), and Tony Warren weren't at practice. But they all played just the same next game. He wasn't consistent."

Sloan has recruited eight high school stars to replace these three transfers and the 6'8" Kenny Carr who is expected to be a first round draft pick by the Buffalo Braves in the June 10th NBA draft.

Bobby Knight, head coach at Indiana, could also write a book on transfers. Six scholarship athletes have left Indiana since Indiana won the 1976 NCAA crown, the latest being 6'10" All-American Derek Holcomb.

Not all coaches are unhappy about transfers. Just ask Coach Lou Carneseca of St. Johns University who has benefited two-fold this year from a transfer athlete. 6'3" Reggie Carter, a 1976 High School All-American, has decided to transfer to St. John's after spending a year at Hawaii. Carter's decision was a big factor in 6'9" 240 pound, Wayne McKoy's decision to attend St. John's since Carter and McKoy were former teammates at Luthern High School. Incidentally, if anyone has not decided where to attend college you might contact McKoy. It seems he has five or six shopping bags full of college brochures and recruiting materials he never had time to read.

> "...So even if a school lands a blue chip prospect there is no guarantee he will be there very long..."

Albert King, regarded by many basketball scouts as the top prospect among this year's high school seniors, had supposedly chosen to attend Arizona State University. The 6'6" forward from Fort Hamilton High School in New York City averaged 38 points and 20 rebounds per game last year and has been the subject of one of this year's hottest recruiting battles. King was supposed to announce that decision May 26 at the eighth annual (New York) City Game, an all-star contest between teams from the Public Schools Athletic League and the Catholic High Schools Athlectic Association.

But King has apparently decided to call time-out temporarily. As he told the New York Times, "I just have to find some more things out. "I realized there are things I didn't look at." King has decided against UCLA because of apparent player unrest with Coach Gene Bartow. Reportedly UCLA Guard Brad Holland and Center Brett Roman Mayland is evidently still in contention with King and it is no doubt when you consider that they had representatives at every Fort Hamilton game this year. But the fact is that King may be trying to negotiate a pro contract thus avoiding college play all together. King has been a standout in several post-season tournaments, but rumor has it that because he is represented by a 25 year old agent that at least some schools have dropped efforts to recruit him because, as one spokesman put it, "you would be inviting an NCAA investigation."

Gene Banks, the 6'7" 210 pound consensus All-American from West Philadelphia High School is already causing problems for Duke officials. Fans are already lining up to purchase tickets for next season to see the electrifying basketball legend in action. Former Duke All-American, Jeff Mullins, Chairman of the Ticket Committee, has the unenviable task of deciding who will get the 8,333 tickets available.

Banks was chosen Most Valuable Player (MVP) at the Dapper Dan Roundball Classic as the Pennsylvania All-Stars defeated the U.S. team 98-92. Banks scored 20 points and snared 10 rebounds and then gave the MVP trophy to a teammate, Sam Clancy. Banks' team also won the Fifth Annual All-American Cage Classic in Akron, Ohio. Banks grabbed 48 rebounds in four games and had 33 points in the title game. And with a crowd of 16,048, including numerous college coaches, looking on, Banks scored 22 points and grapped 10 rebounds in addition to the John Wooden MVP award at the McDonald's Capital Classic in Landover, Maryland.

> "...USC will need a big man if McGuire keeps scheduling like he did last year..."

On the same team with Banks were Albert King, Wayne McKoy, Jeff Roland, Ray Tolbert and Darnell Valentine. Roland, Tolbert and Valentine scored 12 points each. King had only 8 points but led both teams with 15 rebounds. The losing Metro team was lead by Kenny Matthews (18 pts.), and Pete Budko and Tracy Jackson with 12 points each.

The University of North Carolina-Charlotte trying to replace "Cornbread" Maxwell, has signed four basketball prospects so far: 6'8" George Devone of Hobbton, N.C., 6'8" James George of Tampa, Florida, 6'3" Guy Neal of Wellington, Ohio and 6'9" Roland Van Den Bergh of Olympia Fields, Illinois. Kentucky has also signed two big men, 6'10" 250 pound Chuck Aleksinas from Morris, Connecticutt (37 points, 21 rebounds) and 6'10" Scott Courts (21 points) Arvada, Colorado. Vanderbilt signed 6'10" Pat Verwanger of Jacksonville, Florida. Berwanger had narrowed his choice to Vanderbilt or USC.

The University of South Carolina has added its fourth recruit, 6'8" 195 pound Stephen Harty of New York's Archbishop Malloy High School. He averaged 23 points and 14 rebounds per game while playing the center position. Harty will probably be used as a forward and has, according to his coach, "a great outside shot with terrific range." Harty was chosen to several All-New York City Teams. South Carolina still hopes to sign a big man and is still pursuing 6'10" Dan Schayes of Syracuse, New York, and 6'10" Ron Wister of Camden, New Jersey. Schayes has supposedly narrowed his choices to Wake Forest, South Carolina and Syracuse with the hometown school in the lead. USC Associate Coach Donnie Walsh told Osceola this week that Schayes has indicated that he will not make a decision for awhile. Apparently Carolina will have to play the waiting game for a little longer.

USC will need a big man if McGuire keeps scheduling like he did last year. USC's basketball schedule was ranked the twentieth (20th) toughest schedule according to Basketball Weekly and that was the toughest schedule of any Independent and ahead of the likes of Notre Dame (24th), Marquette (28th), Nevada Las-Vega (155th), UNCC (128th), and Furman (135th). The schedule was also comparable to that of ACC teams like Wake Forest (19th), North Carolina (17th), Maryland (16th), and Clemson (23rd). Vanderbilt received top honors on the "suicide schedule" list as having played the toughest schedule last year.

The recruiting sweepstakes are drawing to a close for another year. From here, it would appear that Notre Dame is the leader at this point, with Ohio State, Indiana, North Carolina and Kansas close behind.

In a letter to a constituent dated Sept. 24, 1960, the late state senator Edgar A. Brown offered his opinion of the late Governor James F. Byrnes' public endorsement of Richard Nixon for the presidency: "The Democratic Party fed him for fifty years; like the dog who bit the hand that fed it--he turns out to be."

Is Robert Lee Smith doing someone else's time?

Bonham, and went into the house to make himself and his brother a little early lunch. He then left for his grandfather's house to play basketball with some friends.

Less than half an hour later Smith's neighbor, Ed Singleton, who had originally taken him to the store, called him to the fence.

"Robert Lee, have you seen the lady from the store, Mrs. Fogle? She hasn't returned to the store and the people are worried about her," Singleton said.

Six years later Singleton remembers the exchange well.

"He was calm, not at all nervous or upset, he told me the lady had put him out at his gate and had turned onto the River Road. I said okay and drove off," Singleton said. Robert Lee Smith went back to playing basketball.

A short time later everyone's worst fears were realized; Fogle's partly-clothed body was found in a remote wooded area. Her head had been bashed in.

Having been the last known person to be seen with Fogle, Smith quite naturally came under close police scrutiny and was questioned several times during the day. He repeated the story that the woman had let him out at his gate and driven away. The story was supported by his next-door neighbor, Barbara Jean Bonham, and several others who had seen him leave later for his grandfather's house.

Like everyone else in the tiny coastal town of McClellanville, Smith spent most of the day at the crime site watching the police investigation. He was sitting there, back against a tree, when the SLED bloodhounds were brought in from Columbia and began to sniff around the area. The dogs were offered a scent from the suspected murder weapon, a 12 inch crescent wrench. He was still there when the dogs were turned loose on a scent.

Jesse Williams, then a Charleston County detective, was also there; standing next to Smith when the hounds came up the hill.

"I'd say we were about three feet apart when the bloodhounds came up. They circled me, sniffed my heels and went over to Smith. They circled him, sniffed a little, and went off toward a field. Those dogs paid no more attention to that boy than they paid to me or would've paid to you if you had been there," Williams said.

Fingerprint experts and crime lab technicians swarmed over the scene scrutinizing Fogle's body, her truck, the weapons and the general area in an effort to obtain some clue to the identity of her killer. Although many prints were found, and several identified, only one seemed to be worthy of preserving--a thumb print which bore four points of resemblance to Robert Lee Smith's print. It was found on the handle of the passenger door.

Even though Smith admitted to being in the truck, the police somehow viewed this print as evidence indicating he had committed the crime--a view not generally taken by other law enforcement officials.

> "...The state ignored the contention of the two original investigating officers, with nearly 40 years of experience between them, that Smith could not have committed the crime..."

"Four points of similarity are definitely not sufficient for an identification. I believe we require at least 12," a local FBI agent said.

Even Smith's prosecutor, former Charleston County solicitor Robert B. Wallace, didn't think four points of comparison were sufficient.

"If it says four points I wouldn't think that was sufficient," Wallace said in a recent interview. No prints at all were found on the murder weapon.

But the state didn't really need a fingerprint to convict Smith; they had a confession. A confession of which there are two highly varying accounts.

On the day following the murder Smith, his mother, and his aunt were taken to SLED headquarters in Columbia to take a lie detector test. The purpose of the test, according to both prosecution and defense witnesses, was to prove Smith's innocence to the white people of McClellanville.

According to police Smith failed the test and when confronted with the fact "confessed to the examiner that he had in fact killed Mrs. Fogle together with many of the details of the crime."

According to SLED polygraph examiner Lieutenant Steven Wyndham, Smith said he lured Fogle to the wooded area with the intent of raping her. According to the police, Smith said he had a boy scout meeting in the area and got Fogle to take him in the woods. There, according to police, Smith forced the woman to take off her underclothes and get out of the truck. According to police Smith tried to knock the woman out with the wrench but "went into a fit" and kept hitting her until she was dead. According to Wyndham he asked Smith if he sexually assaulted the woman and he said he did not.

Smith contends Wyndham was putting the words in his mouth and he became frightened and frustrated.

"He kept saying things 'you took her down there on the pretext of going to a boy scout meeting, and you hit her with the wrench, and you made her take her clothes off.' I told him no I hadn't done anything to the lady. I got out of the truck," Smith said.

Smith said after more than an hour of this he finally told Wyndham "you keep it the way you got it." This was the state's confession.

It was this "confession," never reduced to writing, which placed Robert Lee Smith behind bars for the rest of his life.

But if Robert Lee Smith did indeed "confess" to the crime, he couldn't have committed it; the statements in the alleged confession simply don't square with the facts of the case.

For instance, according to Smith's confession, he did not have sexual relations with Fogle, yet a pathologist testified the woman had been sexually molested. There was both the presence of semen and several physicians' indications she had been forcibly raped. The question is would a person admit to murder and not admit to rape. The prospect seems unlikely.

Another discrepancy between the police version of Smith's confession and the facts of the case occurs in regard to the disposal of the weapon. According to Wyndham, Smith said he dropped the wrench after beating Mrs. Fogle with it. However police officers investigating the crime testify they found the wrench under the seat of the truck.

Perhaps one of the most interesting aspects of the Smith case is that both of the original investigating officers do not believe Smith committed the crime. Jesse Williams and George Gathers, detectives with the Charleston County police department at the time, both claim there were several alternate suspects, including one man who was seen by three witnesses running from the area. The witnesses said the man was covered with blood. In contrast, Smith, who was wearing the same clothes all day, did not have any blood on his clothes. Williams thought the whole matter was rather odd.

"The woman was badly beaten and there was blood spattered over a pretty wide area," Williams said. "Whoever killed her would have had to have gotten some blood on his clothes. Robert Lee didn't have one speck of blood on him, not one speck."

Williams even went so far as to have another man check Smith for blood. That man, who also testified Smith was wearing the same clothes, couldn't find any blood either.

The man who originally found the body, J.B. Thomas, has claimed his wife had received a call from Mrs. Singleton saying she had seen Fogle's truck driving down into the woods and told him about it. But both Mrs. Singleton and her husband say she knew nothing of Fogle's disappearance until after the body was discovered. A knife, covered with blood, found at the scene belonged either to "Thomas or one of the people working with him," according to testimony. Thomas, however, was never questioned by police.

Another suspect had an alibi for the time of the murder, but it could best be described as "shaky." The man said he was working on a shrimp boat which was owned by the mayor of McLellanville, but the mayor, when first questioned, said he did not believe the man had worked that day.

"Just a little while after we left the mayor's house," Williams said, "we got a call on the radio saying the mayor just 'remembered' the man had been working."

But the mayor's story fell apart under the affadavits of two other persons. It seems the two people had seen the suspect on the road to Georgetown just about the time of the murder. The two ladies, a Mrs. Davis and her friend, commented to each other because the man's car had broken down. This was the same man who had been seen with blood on his clothes and fresh scratches

"...many of our institutions, including our political parties themselves, are led by men who developed their ideas in response to earlier demands and are therefore unable to understand or cope with a newer set of problems. ...When institutions and leaders are faced with demands they barely understand, their reaction is often to become rigid and defensive, and even angry..."

on his face shortly after the murder. He also was not questioned by police.

Jessie Williams and George Gathers, the two original investigating officers, are convinced the oversight was deliberate.

"They had their minds made up on Robert Lee and just didn't do an adequate job of investigating," Williams told Osceola.

"I always felt there was something wrong with this case. When police officials tell you to stop asking questions, you know something is going on," Gathers said.

Gathers, who has investigated an estimated 600 or more cases in his 27 years as a detective, says the Smith case was the only one in which he testified for the defense.

Both Gathers and Williams alluded to a cover-up on the part of the Charleston County police department at the time of the investigation. Both men were taken off the Smith case shortly after their initial investigation and both claim their notes on the case are now "missing."

"When I thought I was going to be called in to testify I went to the County Police headquarters to get my notes on the case," Williams said, "I was asked 'what notes.' That's what the captain told me."

Gathers also experienced a disappearing act in regard to his notes. "Everything I had on the case was destroyed--notes and a large map showing the area around the crime. They were all gone," Gathers said.

The two were actually threatened at different times regarding the Smith case. "Shortly after I started getting close to a suspect in the case I was called into the chief's office. He told me I was being taken off the case because I 'might get hurt,' " Williams said.

Gathers said he was threatened with losing his job if he testified in the case, and he said he felt there was a cover-up in the case.

"They stopped our investigation of a murder, and when you stop a murder investigation, that's a cover-up," Gathers said.

The Robert Lee Smith case remains, above all, a case of peculiarities and questions. During the entire testimony the state never placed Smith at the scene of the crime, never proved he participated in it, never connected him with the murder weapon and never discredited the fact that the woman was alive when Smith got out of the truck. The state only had a confession which was never reduced to writing. A confession which all parties agreed was crucial to Smith's conviction.

Robert Lee Smith

"No doubt about it, without the confession we would have had no case," Solicitor Robert B. Wallace told Osceola.

Ironically, there was a tape recorder located in the room where Smith was interrogated at SLED headquarters, but there is no tape recording of the conversation. According to the SLED agents, they were out of tape at the time of the questioning.

Another irony is the long delay between the date of the crime and the date of the trial, nearly four years later. Much of the delay can be explained by the lengthy appeal process which was occurring between a preliminary hearing and the General Sessions trial, but there is one delay which has no explanation.

For ten long months, between May of 1974 and April of 1975, Robert Lee Smith remained free, attending high school, while a bench warrant for his arrest languished somewhere in the files. Then, just a few days after his defense attorney George Payton was murdered, and a few months after he turned 17, Robert Lee Smith was arrested. No one has ever been able to explain why it took the authorities ten months to arrest a boy who was living in the house where he was born and going to high school during the entire period.

At Smith's trial, the state did its best to bolster a weak case by entering testimony which smacked of innuendo, circumstance and possible perjury.

For instance, the victim's husband and several of the store employees claimed they did not know the Smith family and had never seen the boy before, testimony which is contradicted by others. At least three persons in McClellanville told Osceola Smith's grandfather had ridden to work with Mr. Fogle for "close to 20 years." The Smith family had cashed government checks at the store for several years after Smith's father was killed in a construction accident.

The state tried to get the jury to believe that Smith was as big at 13 as he was when he finally got to trial. Throughout the trials SLED officers claimed Smith was 5'9" tall and weighed 170 pounds, an absurd contention in light of the fact that four years later Smith was only 5'10" and weighed 180. The state made a big deal of the fact Smith played football and the tuba in the band; of course what the state didn't say was Smith did neither at the time of the crime and in fact did not get involved in the band or the football team until a short time before his arrest.

The state had to make Smith out to be a superman because only a superman could have committed the crime and ended up where Robert Lee Smith was next seen in the amount of time involved. Smith would have had to chase down the truck, force the woman into the woods, rape her, beat her to death and run a mile and a half back to his grandfather's house, and do it all within a half hour without getting any blood on his clothes.

The state bolstered its weak case by adding such touches as the small amount of groceries Smith bought, his alleged "fingerprint" on the door of a truck he admitted riding in, and a lone footprint, unidentified, found in a field near the murder scene which happened to point in the direction of Smith's grandfather's house.

The state ignored the contention of the two original investigating officers, with nearly 40 years of experience between them, that Smith could not have committed the crime. The state ignored Smith's alibi witnesses; witnesses who said Smith was at home and at his grandfather's during the time in question; witnesses who knew the time of his arrival and the time of his departure. The state ignored the discrepancies between Smith's "confession" and the actual occurrences in the case. As Robert Lee Smith told me at Kirkland, "They didn't look at it but one way."

In the overview, the conviction of Robert Lee Smith presents a web of lies, fear, intimidation and cover-up woven against a background of subdued racism. When I set out to do a story on the Smith case I told myself I would avoid the racial aspect of the case. The more I learned the more I realized that was impossible to do.

Smith is black, the victim was white. Officers Gathers and Williams, like all of Smith's defense witnesses and his original attorney, are black; all those testifying against him were white. I'm white and I had a hard time believing that aspect for a while, but I talked to black people in McClellanville and I sensed the fear. I was told there were people in McClellanville who could help clear Smith but they were afraid to say anything. Afraid of what? "Afraid of what the white people will do," I was told.

But of all the questions involved in Robert Lee Smith's case there are really only two which remain in my mind. Was it just one of the numerous miscarriages of justice, or was it a deliberate abortion? And whose time is Robert Lee Smith doing behind that fence at Kirkland?

If there is any one word that has consistently described Fleetwood Mac over the past ten years, it is change. In the course of their transition from 1967 British blues to their enormous success as an LA rock band in 1975, they have gone through six guitarists and three label changes. Only the presence of bassist John McVie and drummer Mick Fleetwood, and the band's name have remained unchanged; even their ownership of the name was briefly questioned at one point when their manager sent a bogus band on tour under the name Fleetwood Mac.

Initially started as an offshoot of John Mayall's Bluesbreakers by McVie, Fleetwood, and guitarists Peter Green, Danny Kirwan, and Jeremy Spencer, the band was widely respected in those early days for their innovative approach to the blues. Their third LP "Then Play On" is generally considered a classic. Eventually, as guitarists came and went, Fleetwood Mac gradually moved into a more melodic rock sound, with the contributions of new members Christine McVie on keyboards and vocals and expatriate Californian Bob Welch on guitar serving as major influences in the band's direction. Such popular albums as "Bare Trees" were the result.

When Welch left to form his own band in 1975, Fleetwood asked the Californian songwriting duo of Lindsey Buckingham and Stevie Nicks, whose collective work he had encountered in a studio scouting mission, to join the band.

The result of that merger was the hugely successful album "Fleetwood Mac," the band's tenth, but the first to bring them into prominence of a major magnitude. It has become the biggest seller in Warner Brothers history. Their most recent effort, "Rumours," also went platinum. Its recording was a traumatic time for the band, however, with John and Christine McVie ending an 8 year marriage, Buckingham and Nicks separating after 6 years, and Fleetwood divorcing his wife Jenny as well.

Both albums are characterized by the same emphasis on song and melody, with Christine McVie evidencing the greatest maturation yet of her smooth love songs, and Buckingham and Nicks adding a degree of harmonic interaction that the band had not possessed in the past. These MOR tendencies, plus Fleetwood and McVie's solid rhythm section, and Buckingham's ability as a rock and accoustic guitarist, have sent them to the heights as one of America's favorite bands.

Fleetwood Mac's popularity was well evidenced by the turnout at their Carolina Coliseum concert May 24. The crowd was polite to opener Kenny Loggins, just starting out solo after a parting of the ways with musical cohort Jim Messina. He was backed by a 7-piece band, to rather cluttered effect, and was unfortunately brandishing a new singing style, full of breathy little exhalations ala Tom Jones, that gave his basically hearty and pleasing voice a very affected air. His new material is so lightweight as to be elusive in a bland sort of way; neither particularly meaningful nor entertaining, it was just there. His older tunes -- "House at Pooh Corner," "Danny's Song," -- were delivered like crumbs to be thrown to the audience. Later in his set he and the band did start clicking. The percussionist at last got together a foundation for the rest of the band, and "Angry Eyes," "Vahevala," and a new number "Lady Luck" were contagiously exuberant. Overall, although Loggins is capable of a wholesome infectiousness, he was just trying too hard this night.

Fleetwood Mac, on the other hand, came up with a harder edged sound than one would expect from hearing the recent albums. They started with Christine's "Say You Love Me," Lindsey crisp on guitar, but with Christine's warm vocals partially inaudible and Stevie Nicks off a bit on her harmony.

They fared better with "Monday Morning," Mick Fleetwood drumming steadily, chugga chugga, John McVie impassively proficient on bass, and Lindsey Buckingham singing with that desperate involvement that quickly established him as focal point of the band, a position he maintained throughout the evening with the help of his alternately fluid and raucous guitar work.

In every account I have heard or read of Fleetwood Mac performances, mention is always made of the way vocalist Stevie Nicks dominates the stage, dancing and writhing in a diaphanous swirl. At the Columbia concert however, Nicks stuck strictly to vocals, barely moving at all except to walk offstage when she was not singing. In explanation of a hat pulled low over her face, Nicks mentioned early in the evening that she was suffering from a severe eye infection; apparently it was painful enough to severely restrict her usual stage manner. Stevie was led on and off stage later in the evening, and did not reappear at all for the final encore. Except for a brief blaze-up at the end of "Rhiannon," Nicks' hoarse warble sounded tentative and fragile during her songs.

The only number the band performed that was not from either of the two newest albums was "Oh Well" from Then Play On—a "blast from the past" as John put it. Buckingham did the vocals, and rocked most creditably through the guitar part to give the number a considerably different sound from the original.

"Rhiannon" was haunting, bass and drums providing a primal beat, you could almost see massive forests looming. Stevie seemed to want to dance during the weaving instrumentals of the song, but just couldn't get it together. Her version of "Landslide" was her best number of the evening, enhanced by the wistfulness with which she sang it.

To my frustration, Christine's voice was difficult to hear throughout the evening. John's bass thundered most splendidly and appropriately on numbers like "Blue Letter" and "Go Your Own Way," but it rumbled too loudly for smoother pieces like Christine's "Oh Daddy." Her song "Over My Head" was performed much more as a rock tune, and successfully so, than it had been when recorded.

Although it is Christine and Stevie's songs that have been the most consistent hits for Fleetwood Mac, and their songs were happily welcomed by the audience, from my perspective Lindsey Buckingham is the strongest factor in the core of the band's music. John McVie and Fleetwood are rock steady, driving and energizing, but it is Buckingham who highlights the musical energy onstage. His voice is surprisingly similar to Chris's in its smoothness, but it has more bottom to it, and complements their rock tunes better. His guitar work was sometimes excellent, on "I'm So Afraid" he did one of the best jobs of hitting a musical range of pure feeling that I've heard in a good while. He adds a vocal intensity as well that considerably widens the scope of the band's sound.

After a hard-hitting "World Turning" and "Blue Letter," the former briefly featuring Fleetwood on an African talking drum at the front of the stage for a change, the band left smiling, leaving a tumultuous audience behind. They encored with "Second Hand News," "The Chain," and "Songbird," where Christine's vocals at long last came through clearly. Crystal clear, in fact, worth the wait. Sometimes if you're patient long enough, things turn out even better than you expected. A lesson from the Mac.
